

A Lecture on the Working Mens Party: First Delivered October Sixth, Before the Charlestown Lyceum, and Published at Their Request (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from A Lecture on the Working Mens Party: First Delivered October Sixth, Before the Charlestown Lyceum, and Published at Their Request First, that man is, by his nature, a working being; and second, that the daily value of his work, estimated merely in money, is immensely great, in any civilized community. I have made these preliminary remarks, as an introduction to some observations, which I propose to submit in the remainder of this lecture, on the subject of a working mens party. Towards the organization of such a party, steps have been taken in various parts of the country. It is probable, that a great diversity of views exists, among those who have occupied themselves upon the subject, in different places. This circumstance, and the novelty of the subject in some of its aspects, and its importance in all, have led me to think, that we might pass an hour profitably, in its contemplation. I will observe upon it, in the first place, then, that if, as I have endeavored to show, man is by nature a working being, it would follow, that a working mens party is founded, in the very principles of our nature.-most parties may be considered as artificial in their very essence; many are local, temporary, and personal. What will the Adams, or the Jackson, or the Clay party be, a hundred years hence? What are they now, in nine-tenths of the habitable globe? Mere non-entities. But the working mens party, however organized, is one that must subsist, in every civilized country to the end of time. In other words, its first principles are laid in our natures.
