

Prince Zilah

Jules Claretie

Excuse me, Monsieur, but pray tell me what vessel that is over there. The question was addressed to a small, dark man, who, leaning upon the parapet of the Quai des Tuileries, was rapidly writing in a note-book with a large combination pencil, containing a knife, a pen, spare leads, and a paper-cutter all the paraphernalia of a reporter accustomed to the expeditions of itinerant journalism. When he had filled, in his running hand, a leaf of the book, the little man tore it hastily off, and extended it to a boy in dark blue livery with silver buttons, bearing the initial of the newspaper, LActualite; and then, still continuing to write, he replied: Prince Andras Zilah is giving a fete on board one of the boats belonging to the Compagnie de la Seine. A fete? Why? To celebrate his approaching marriage, Monsieur. Prince Andras! Ah! said the first speaker, as if he knew the name well; Prince Andras is to be married, is he? And who does Prince Andras Zil Zilah! He is a Hungarian, Monsieur. Prince Andras Zilah had invited his friends, this July morning, to a breakfast in the open air, before the moving panorama of the banks of the Seine. Very well known in Parisian society, which he had sought eagerly with an evident desire to be diverted, like a man who wishes to forget, the former defender of Hungarian independence, the son of old Prince Zilah Sandor, who was the last, in 1849, to hold erect the tattered standard of his country, had been prodigal of his invitations, summoning to his side his few intimate friends, the sharers of his solitude and his privacy, and also the greater part of those chance fugitive acquaintances which the life of Paris inevitably gives, and which are blown away as lightly as they appeared, in a breath of air or a whirlwind.
