The Rover Boys in the Jungle
Or
Stirring Adventures in Africa

Arthur M. Winfield (Edward Stratemeyer)

Excerpt: ...good to put foot on land again! Indeed it will! cried Dick. The ocean is all well enough, but a fellow doesnt want too much of it. And yet I heard one of the French sailors say that he hated the land, put in Sam. He hadnt set foot on shore for three years. When they reach port he always remains on deck duty until they leave again. Mortimer Blaze went ashore at once, after bidding all of the party a hearty good-by. Hope we meet again, he said. And, anyway, good luck to you! And good luck to you! cried Tom. Hope you bag all of the lions and tigers you wish, and so they parted, not to meet again for many a day. It was decided that the Rovers should not leave the ship until morning. It can well be imagined that none of the boys slept soundly that night. All wondered what was before them, and if they should succeed or fail in their hunt. Dis aint much ob a town, remarked Aleck, as they landed, a little before noon, in a hot, gentle shower of rain. Nuffin like New York. There is only one New York, as there is but one London, answered Randolph Rover. Our architecture would never do for such a hot climate. Along the river front was a long line of squatty warehouses, backed up by narrow and far from clean streets, where the places of business were huddled together, and where a good share of the trading was done on the sidewalk. The population was a very much mixed one, but of the Europeans the English and French predominated. The natives were short, fat, and exceedingly greasy appearing. Hardly a one of them could speak English. I dont see any Americans, remarked Dick. I suppose - There is an American store! burst out Sam, pointing across the way. He had discovered a general trading store, the dilapidated sign of which read: SIMON HOOK, Dealer in Everything. English Spoken by an American. Horn of All Kinds Bought. Yankee Boots Are the Best! He believes in advertising, laughed...
